Board strives to expand outreach

Hello and welcome to all! My name is Colin Chang and I am the new IU Asian Alumni Association president. I am very excited to get the opportunity to make a difference for Asian alumni associated with Indiana University. Please allow me to briefly introduce myself.

I am a local physician in town for Internal Medicine Associates. I grew up in Bloomington with two older brothers. The oldest brother is married and has moved to northern California. He is enjoying sunny California as an optometrist for Kaiser. The middle brother has moved back to Bloomington and is helping on the IUAAA board.

He is an ophthalmologist and is married with three children. There are two girls and a boy, who was just born in January. Our mother has returned to Bloomington after a few years in Florida and is retired. Our father continues to teach at the Southern College of Optometry in Memphis. The Chang family has strong ties to the Bloomington community and Indiana University.

The IUAAA board and I want to develop a strong Asian community here in southern Indiana. This will eventually allow us to encompass fellow alumni from around the world. We are currently setting goals and organizing events to get the ball rolling. In October, we will be participating in the Homecoming weekend. We would love for you to be a part of this exciting time. Please join us!

Confirmed: Asians spotted at the library

Joon Park graduated from Indiana University in 1998 with BA in comparative literature and East Asian studies. He was president of AAA from 1996 to 1998. He was also a co-founder of the Student Coalition and the author of the Strategic Directions grant for the creation of an Asian Culture Center. Joon heads the financial modeling division for Global Securities Research at Merrill Lynch. He lives in New York City.

parents and they are overwhelmed with a sense of filial piety? Or is the answer much simpler? Maybe it's because it's the only place open.

Park

When I was in high school, my friends and I were always looking for a place to hang out: an abandoned warehouse, a late-night Taco Bell, a friend's house whose parents were gone for the weekend. We would usually gather and commiserate about the drama that is teenage life. We nattered about the provincial suburb that we lived in. I suppose you can call it a blathering fellowship. I remember we talked about going away. We talked about our future.

At the IU library, there was an endless supply of blathering (and fellowship.) Perhaps the lack of sleep and the creepy resonance of fluorescent lights cricketing do something to you. However, I always felt that it was a place where you really got to know people. It was amazing to hear and understand how others (many of whom who grew up outside the United States) viewed certain issues. There was so much to discover from other people with different backgrounds and disciplines. In that respect, there was a tremendous amount of learning going on at the library (just a different kind).

In retrospect, the IU library reminds me of high school in many ways. When I reflect on the time that my friends and I spent at the library, I remember that we talked about going away. We talked about our future.

— Joon Park, BA '98

I would make my parents proud if I told them that some of the fondest memories of my undergraduate years were spent at the library. Of course, I would omit the fact that I actually didn't do a whole lot of schoolwork there. And why is that, exactly? Why did Asians gather at the one place specifically designed to inspire students to study, yet they did anything but study? Is it because Asians sense the omniscient eyes of their

Main Library is second home to many students

As a student at IU, you have all probably spent time in this building ... or at least should have; the Main Library. The large stone edifice in the center of campus has served many purposes; a quiet study area, a place to eat, a meeting place, and more. A majority of students here have called this place a second home.

The building is as multifaceted as the student population. It boasts a new information technology lobby with hundreds of computers and workstations for late-night typing or group work needs. The undergraduate half houses five floors where solitude and silence can be "enjoyed" for last-minute cramming. Then, there is, of course, the graduate section. The towering 11-floor building contains dark, eerie floors, perfect for avoiding interruptions or distractions. The diligent can reward themselves with a light snack or a meal from the new food court in the basement, ordering anything from coffee and cookies to salads and sandwiches.

At the heart of it all, are the books. The Main Library contains nigh all the books necessary for research papers or projects. Whether it is a 90-year-old novel to an electronic copy, the library surely has it. And with the help of knowledgeable librarians, it is difficult to go wrong.

College years will bring back many memories other than the parties on weekends. I know that spending nearly 12 hours in the library studying for finals will be forever engrained in my mind. Maybe I should start paying this place rent.

Off target, or out of focus?

I am the "7" that pops up when you punch "3+3" into your calculator. I am the orange you get when you dye your black hair "blonde." I am the college graduate who has made it through in one piece, but still seems just a little off target. No 4.0 GPA to secure a place in that excellent research program. No auditions scheduled for joining that prestigious performing group. No killer management position in that Fortune 500 company. It was not until after dwelling on these "failures" awhile that I realized those were not even my goals to begin with.

At the start of my freshman year, I took a survey about my expectations for college. There is only one question I remember: "What is the most important thing you want to get out of attending college? A) A professional degree that will lead into a high-paying position; B) a body of knowledge that will allow access to a graduate studies program; C) a better understanding of who you are and what you want in life; or D) a skills repertoire that will allow you to practice a specific craft or trade."

While each had positive elements, C

stood out as most important to me, and in retrospect, IU delivered. College was an abundance of life experiences packed into four short years, all in a place I had never been and with people I had never met. There were so many opportunities to challenge myself, to grow, and to push myself in ways I had not even imagined in years previous. My experiences at IU helped me recognize my strengths and passions, as well as identify what I did not want to do in my life.

So what was your choice heading into your undergraduate years? Perhaps you wanted A, and your critics claimed you "sold out" to riches and materialism. Perhaps, like me, you chose C, and your critics claimed you "copped out" for flighty, romantic ideals. Regardless, it is not so important to choose one over another; nor is it so important what your critics might say. What is important is that you stick with goals that are significant in your life; it's easy to get caught up in fulfilling other people's dreams. Don't sell yourself short; stay focused on what's really important to you.

—Chris Sinclair, BA'03

Retreat offers lessons in leadership

While most students occupy their winter Saturdays on the Indiana University Bloomington campus recovering from the previous evening's activities and going to IU basketball games, this was not the case on Jan. 31 for a handful of members from various Asian student groups. These 20 students carpooled out of Bloomington during the wee hours of the morning to spend the day at a cozy lodge in the heart of Bradford Woods, 35 minutes north of campus, to share some of their personal racial experiences at IU, participate in team-building and leadership exercises and, more important, forge new friendships.

The Annual Asian Student Leadership Retreat, now in its fourth year, is a time for students to get away from the often impersonal hustle and bustle of the university and address some important issues facing the Asian student community as well as reflect on the student minority leadership needed on campus. Theresa Chen, the graduate assistant of the Asian Culture Center and coordinator of the event, said, "I very much appreciated the opportunity to watch 17 motivated and energetic students empower themselves and strive to become better leaders."

Throughout the day, the students also completed an array of team-building and leadership activities. Each activity required an element of organization, execution, and most important, communication. "Communication is not just speaking, but listening too," Chen mentioned after one of the activities. After each activity, the students would discuss some of the difficulties they encountered and relate them to other experiences. Rosalyn Nguyen, a freshman at her first leadership retreat, commented, "It's really amazing how you can take these small concrete activities, like getting 15 people to get a marble across the room into a cup without anyone touching it, and apply the concepts to the larger problems we face in the real world."

By the end of the day, the students had reaffirmed their commitment to the Asian community at Indiana University and had taken a small but meaningful step to become better listeners and stronger leaders.
