La Casa, students reach out to Latino high schoolers

Spurred by the low university enrollment rates of Latino students and the lack of information getting to Latino high school students, La Casa director Lillian Casillas has started an outreach project to help Latino high school students learn more about college.

Casillas, fellow staff member Michelle Gutierrez, and student volunteers visit high schools and give presentations that cover various themes, such as reasons to attend college, application procedures, standardized tests, financial aid, and college life. So far during this academic year, Casillas's group has visited or has scheduled to visit 12 schools from Angola to New Albany and places in between.

Casillas says that she has been saddened by some of her contacts with Latino students because many lack even basic information about college. Casillas believes that oftentimes students do not receive information about college because someone else has decided that they are not "college material."

IU Bloomington senior Liliana Garcia was surprised at all the questions about standardized tests at a recent outreach event. "There was one young lady who was a senior [in high school] and was waiting to be accepted to IU," says Garcia, "but she had not taken the SAT yet. She had just recently learned about the test requirement. I was disappointed to hear of the lack of support from guidance counselors."

Another major issue that arises is financial aid. "In our outreach, we have found that many students and their families have little information on how to pay for college, what the resources are, and how to plan ahead. In many of these cases, the students will have to educate the parents," says Gutierrez.

For everyone who volunteers their time for these outreach efforts, it is especially important that the information is coming from other Latinos. Casillas believes that it is key to show students role models from the Latino community: "Latinos talking to Latinos is so important when you are trying to convince students to finish high school and to look at the role education plays in enhancing opportunities for their future."

Garcia believes that sharing personal experiences can encourage those who may be facing similar barriers and can also provide a realistic picture of college life and the challenges that may be encountered.

Garcia says it is important that IU alumni somehow also get involved in efforts to encourage and support Latino students. "As alumni, you are enduring life's everyday challenges out in the real

Mezcla gets in gear for 2005

Ten years ago this spring, the first Latino Little 500 bike team was formed. The team had three successful seasons before the leading riders graduated. Last year, the first all-Latina bike team was formed and competed in Little 500, renewing Latino representation in the event.

Team leader Rosa Bonilla reports that the team is a "mixture of our beautiful Latin American cultures" and that the women are training daily. In fact, the name "Mezcla" means "mixture" in Spanish. The 2005 team is composed of Bonilla, Barbara Alvarado, Jessica Barajas, Monica Reyes, Annette Soto, and Elizabeth Tegard.

Team Mezcla would like to thank everyone who is supporting and encouraging the team, especially those who have given financially to help the team obtain much-needed equipment.

La Casa director receives Staff Merit Award

Lillian Casillas, director of La Casa Latino Culture Center, was presented with the 2004 Staff Merit Award at a ceremony on the Bloomington campus on Oct. 13, 2004.

The award recognizes staff for, among other things, exemplary job performance and a demonstrated special effort toward improving Indiana University for the benefit of students, faculty, staff, alumni, and other university associates.

Each year, two staff members are chosen from each of three categories: service staff, support staff, and professional staff. A committee appointed by Chancellor Ken Gros Louis interviews nominees and chooses the award winner.

IUB ranks high nationally

IUB ranked 71st overall and 30th among public national research universities in the latest U.S. News & World Report rankings of the nation's top colleges and universities.

The Kelley School of Business ranked high in rankings by several other publications: 13th among MBA programs that appeal to corporate recruiters on a regional level by the Wall Street Journal; first for best professors and third for best facilities by the Princeton Review; and 18th among all MBA programs by Business Week.

The IU Bloomington School of Law Library tied for first place in a recent report by the National Jurist, which compared 183 law school libraries across the country. The October 2004 report, titled "Best Law Libraries: Why Indiana Outranks Harvard," ranked law school libraries based on such criteria as number of volumes and ratio of professional librarians to students.

Corona says that when she first came to IU, she was one of five Hispanics on campus. The first Latino weekend was organized at that time and became one of her fondest memories. She continues to be active with IU and now holds a life membership in the IU Alumni Association.

The Alumni Association "is a terrific method of staying in touch with the university," she says. "It has a lot to offer. It's inclusive. Becoming a member was the best thing I did."

She advises undergraduates to “try new experiences, make friends outside your own safe circle, and give back to your community in whatever way you can.”

Corona also has a master’s degree in social work from the University of Denver; her IU bachelor’s degree is in Spanish and sociology. In addition to her current work, she has worked in northern Indiana since 1969 as a school social worker, teacher, and private advocate.

Latino Leadership Conference held in Bloomington

The sixth annual Indiana University Latino Leadership Conference, held on the IUB campus on March 5, was organized by the Latino Enhancement Cooperative and La Casa to celebrate the uniqueness of Latino students in a forum by and for students. The forum seeks to cultivate the exchange of ideas, values, and beliefs to promote scholarship, development, and empowerment of Indiana’s college and high school Latinos. The Latino Alumni Association sponsored the conference breakfast and organized a morning team-building session. Board members Esther Vargas and Gavin Zapata participated throughout the daylong conference.
