The State Police—A Modern Necessity:

“For the security of yourself, your home and your government.”

+ + +

“. . . The police are the most important part of the machinery for criminal justice . . .”—National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement (1931).

+ + +

“The states can set up large, professional police forces, fully equipped with all of the techniques and implements of modern police science. In short, they can go a long way toward solving the great American police problem.”—Bruce Smith, Attorney General’s Conference on Crime, Washington, 1934.

+ + +

“I believe we will see the day when State Police will take their place in the law enforcement picture as a necessity . . . They can be of inestimable value.”—John Edgar Hoover, Director Federal Bureau of Investigation, Attorney General’s Conference on Crime, Washington, 1934.

+ + +

“State Police are now a necessity . . . They have done good work in policing rural areas; they have cooperated with sheriffs, constables, municipal police and Federal police; they have decreased bank robbery; they have given assistance in riots and other disorders; and they have especially shown their ability to capture desperate criminals. . . Their higher morale is unquestionably caused in part by freedom from political influence in the choosing of State Police . . . and by their training . . . For all these achievements they have won the commendation of citizens . . . The ideal to be sought is a single State Police force . . . Their education should be made a continual process by the establishment of a state school for police and an institute for police research . . . Until that time . . . we shall remain what we are today, the most crime-ridden country in the civilized world.”—Vollmer and Parker, Crime and the State Police (1935).

Plan and History of the School

The Indiana State Police School, Summer Session 1937, is held for the selection and training of recruits for the Indiana State Police.

The School is conducted jointly by the Indiana State Police and the Indiana University Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology. By resolution adopted in the spring of 1936, the Indiana State Police Board directed the Superintendent of State Police to cooperate with the Institute "in the organization and maintenance of a training school for police recruits." In accordance with this resolution, the training school has been organized and maintained. The Board and the Institute have worked in close cooperation. They have joined in conferences, such as the Medico-legal conference of December 4, 1936, in the work of scientific detection laboratories, in securing legislation, and in maintaining regular curricular courses in police training at the University. These courses are part of Indiana University's four-year police training curriculum. This curriculum is based upon the principle championed by Vollmer, which is that professional police training must consist mainly of general academic study. This four-year course is believed to be the first of its kind and extent in a state university or in an American university of general academic and professional scope. The State Police-State University combination in a four-year professional course, supplemented by intensive summer sessions like the present session, is considered to be not only an original but also a permanent contribution to police progress in this country.

The State Police

The Indiana State Police organization was established in 1921 by the General Assembly. Its powers were limited, however, to hardly more than highway patrol powers. In 1933 the General Assembly gave to the State Police general police powers. In 1935 the General Assembly reorganized the State Police by creating the Department of State Police. Control was placed in the State Police Board. This board consists of four members, "appointed by the Governor, not more than two of whom shall be adherents of the same political party." A leader in securing this legislation was Lieutenant-Governor Schrickler. The statute was modeled in part on the State Board of Accounts Act, with the plan of preventing politics from entering into the State Police. The Board has succeeded in establishing principles of careful selection, of adequate training and of political independence for the Indiana State Police. Upon this basis, the organization has won national recognition as one of the most progressive and successful State Police organizations in the United States.

The Institute

The Indiana University Institute is an organization to coordinate the appropriate schools, departments, facilities and personnel of Indiana University for direct services in criminal law administration. It has five divisions. Police training is a part of the work of Division II, which is concerned with training for official duties in criminal law administration. Division IV deals with drafting statutes to improve criminal law administration, such as statutes to improve criminal procedure and statutes to provide for a continuous and progressive strengthening of the laws governing police systems. A comparative study, in behalf of the Indiana State Police, of the laws and practice in the 12 states which have State Police systems is a necessary part of this division of the work of the Institute. Division V is concerned with the Institute's public relations work, to increase public information about criminal law administration.

By public conferences on police work, especially in 1928, in 1932, and in 1936, at Indiana University, informed public sentiment for strengthening police service has been promoted. The Institute is continuing this work.

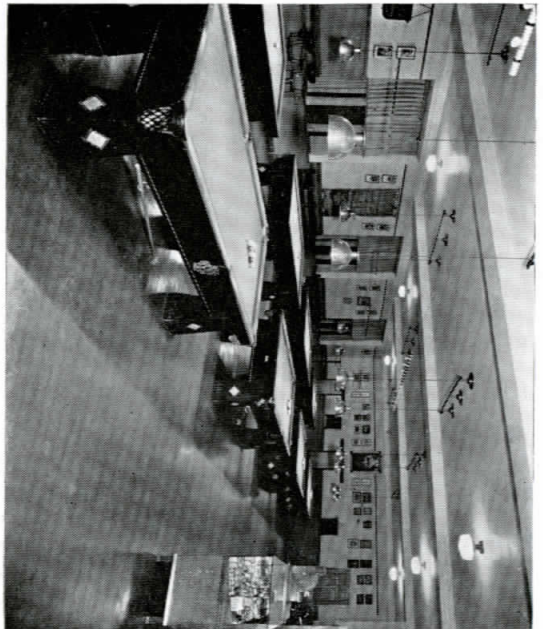

The Institute was formally established by the Trustees of Indiana University on June 15, 1935. Its foundations, however, were established long before that date. The work of four of the present five divisions, including the divisions above described, had been carried on for about ten years by the present director of the Institute, through state and national bar associations, and through other organizations. The action of the Board of Trustees, however, has enabled the director to continue this work through the Institute with better facilities and results. The establishment of the Institute, moreover, made possible the work classified as Division I, for research and penology. This division was established under the direction of the new head of the department of sociology, Edwin H. Sutherland, one of the foremost criminologists of the country. Criminal law and criminology, and other appropriate subjects of University activity, are thus jointly brought to bear upon the common problems of criminal law administration, and especially, upon the problems of police. The Institute is believed to be the first organization of its kind and extent in an American university. It is similar in part to long-established organizations in some European universities.

The Police Cadets

The Indiana General Assembly of 1937 authorized an increase of one hundred men in the uniformed force of the State Police. This increase and some replacements will permit more than fifty men to be added this year, following the conclusion of the school, and a similar number to be added next year.

The State Police Board, by public announcement early in 1937, invited young men who possessed stated qualifications to apply for admission to the School. Almost five hundred men sent in their applications before May 1, 1937, the date limit set by the Board. The Board conducted a careful check on the statements made by the applicants in their applications. The falsity of material allegations resulted in some applicants being dropped. An investigation of character in the applicants' home communities led to more applicants being rejected. Some of these rejections were for conviction of crime. Physical examinations eliminated many applicants. About two hundred applicants were left to take a competitive written examination at Indiana University on June 7. This examination, and additional physical examinations eliminated an additional number of applicants. Approximately one hundred and twenty applicants have survived the examinations and the character investigations. They are the police cadets who make up the student body of the School.

The Indiana State Police and the Indiana University Institute extend sincere acknowledgements to the many individuals and officials who have given liberal assistance to the School. Chief Michael F. Morrissey of the Indianapolis Police Department for many years has aided the University in the development of police training. To this school he has detailed three members of his department for the associate instructional staff. The Indiana National Guard has supplied equipment and other assistance with a fine spirit of cooperation and loyalty to the best interests of the State.
